THE CLOUD IN 2015

Steven Harrison predicts how business use of cloud computing will develop and change during the next 12 months:

Hybrid is the equaliser

Whilst cloud computing has become an integral part of IT systems, concerns around vendor lock-in, licensing restrictions and security mean that businesses are still resistant to moving all IT operations into a hosted environment.

The year of cloud accountability

As businesses of all size continue to migrate infrastructures to virtualized platforms, the demand for service provider accountability will reach its peak.

Time to telecommute

A recent survey of 100 business executives by Exponential-e revealed that 72 percent of employees still struggle with their company's flexible working policy due to IT issues.

To maximise productivity and employee satisfaction, businesses need to realise that the technology is there to enable a flexible and mobile workforce.

Context-aware security

Absolute security is a myth and a new approach to information security is required for businesses to successfully protect themselves against the vulnerabilities that exist in today's infrastructure.

Corporate data at risk on the public Internet

Over the next year, businesses will realise that corporate data puts it at high risk of being compromised if they are relying on the public Internet to transport it.
